Dear Karl Loren:

After watching my local news and hearing of Methyl Sulfonyl Methane for the first time, I decided to try MSM for my chronic back pain. The report mentioned that James Coburn, an Oscar winning actor, solved much of his arthritis pain using MSM. I was sold from then on, but I ran into a problem with the cream based version of this homeopathic drug.

You see, I was very hesitant to use something nicknamed "organic sulfur." Sounds like poison, don't you think? So before using the MSM cream on myself, I used it on my dog. Pepper (that's my dog) became discolored and died soon thereafter.

Pepper was a very old dog with serious health problems, so I'm unsure whether she died of natural causes or whether the cream accelerated her death. She had survived three U.S. presidents and two hits by automobiles, one of which was just a week before her untimely demise. However, poor Pepper left this Earth just after I applied the MSM cream all over her back legs and tail.

I realize that I did not purchase this cream from you, but you seem to be the best expert on MSM that I could find. Should I worry about my safety when using this drug, and will the green cream I have also discolor my skin and hair? I can handle having a pale, green back if my pain is alleviated.

Sincerely,
